of the emissions reductions (under the Climate Change Act). Local air pollution is linked to the development of asthma and other respiratory conditions in children, and improvements in air quality are crucial to fighting the major child health and developmental health risks of air pollution, as we all know that children are particularly sensitive to environmental health problems. The results of my study offer strong evidence that particulate pollution is a risk factor for asthma and shows that both NO₂ and PM_{2.5} exposures were associated with increased asthma attacks, hospital admissions and emergency department presentations. The research is consistent with the evidence showing that local air pollution from vehicle emissions, industrial emissions and agricultural emissions increases asthma attacks, hospital admissions and emergency department presentations among children and the evidence showing that NO₂ and PM_{2.5} exposures are associated with increased asthma attacks, hospital admissions and emergency department presentations among children. I have been investigating air pollution for more than 25 years and I can say without any doubt that this study represents the largest study to date of the impact of air pollution on childhood asthma and the results are clear that the current policy of emissions reductions (under the Climate Change Act) is not enough to protect public health. The true problem of air pollution in London is the many millions of tonnes of emissions that are produced each year that have been left unmitigated and are not included in the emissions estimates made under the Climate Change Act. Without these 'hidden' emissions there is no way that the current levels of NO₂ or PM
