In the 1950s and 60s, most Chinese, Indians and Vietnamese lived in rural communities in which women did not work outside the household and typically did not attend school. China’s Communist Party established the “Women’s Liberation” movement in the mid-1970s, especially in Hunan and Guangxi Provinces. At this time, men from “backward” villages were forced to move to the cities and were suddenly confronted by women who rejected their traditional roles. This movement soon led to the refusal of married women from conservative families to accept traditional women’s roles and the increased participation of women in the workforce. South Korea, Japan and Taiwan were colonies of the feudal Japanese Empire (1868â€“1945). Japan treated Koreans and Taiwanese as inferiors and forced them into a system of “warrior” and “flowering” classes. In Japan and Korea, women had few rights and were the servants of men. Women were often forced to work by their husbands in the rural areas, many were forced into sexual slavery, and were sometimes subjected to sexual assault. At this time, women in Japan and Korea also began to be able to take more responsibility in their social and political lives. Vietnam’s rural areas were under the control of the French until 1954. Men were used for soldiering, while most women were left to do the farming and care of the home. Women usually wore the “chemise” which fell from the neck to their ankles. Starting in the 1960s, under the influence of the Catholic Church, women began to participate in “changing” the role of women in society and many began to take on new roles. Women were now educated in the formal areas and were able to participate in social work, politics,
