PROJECT SUMMARY Food allergic reactions are potentially life threatening. The immune responses against food allergens vary and often require a combination of various immunotherapies. Food allergy and atopic dermatitis (AD) are both T-cell mediated inflammatory diseases. In allergen-mediated skin diseases, such as allergic contact dermatitis (ACD), food allergens are detected by the innate immune system and subsequent immune reactions are driven by T-cells. Conversely, food allergy elicits an early immunoglobulin E (IgE)-mediated response followed by T-cell-driven responses. The presence of IgE antibodies against food allergens is a common characteristic of both food allergy and AD, but the respective role of IgE antibodies in triggering the skin inflammation is not well understood. We found that the T-cell-specific antibody deficiency JH4004, a compound which blocks the interaction between the α 4 subunit of the low affinity IgE receptor (FceRI) and its cognate allergen, blocks the generation of a Th2 T-cell response and the development of skin lesions in an ovalbumin (OVA) skin sensitization model in mice.

Another T-cell-specific antibody deficiency strain, C3H.SW mice, which cannot produce IgA antibodies, is characterized by a severe skin inflammation. T-cells from C3H.SW mice stimulated with OVA in vitro produced a high amount of IL-13, a cytokine that is important in the development of AD. We hypothesize that IgA antibodies produced by the B-cells are responsible for initiating a skin inflammation through interaction with the FceRI on mast cells, resulting in the production of Th2 cytokines, such as IL-13.

We will test this hypothesis through the following Specific Aims. In Aim 1, we will characterize IgA antibodies produced by C3H.SW mice before and after OVA sensitization. In Aim 2, we will determine whether blocking the interaction between IgA and FcεRI on mast cells prevents the development of the skin inflammation. SOLD OUT!!!! SOLD OUT!!!!!! Space is limited!!!
